The south dock was once a large area of 'marshland sprinkled with an occasional apple tree'. On one of the earliest maps (1673) of the city of Dublin, by Bernard de Gomme, there are no buildings marked on the south side of the River Liffey. This marshy riverside area is named on Gomme's map as 'South Strand'. He noted that it was 'overflowed by the high tide, with up to five feet of water at neap tide, dry at half tide and dry enough at low tide to walk across the sand'.
